3. The Visual Presentation Laws of Manchu Decorative Patterns

The visual presentation laws of Manchu decorative patterns are the core of their folk art design, which not only reflect the aesthetic concepts of the Manchu people, but also reflect their deep cultural heritage and historical inheritance. Through the in-depth study of these patterns, we can reveal their unique laws in composition, colour application, pattern subject matter, etc., which can provide rich creative inspiration and theoretical basis for modern design [2].

3.1. Laws of Compositional Form

Manchu decorative patterns often use symmetrical or balanced forms in the composition, which gives people a sense of stability and harmony. Symmetrical composition is especially common in Manchu decorative patterns, especially in costumes, artifacts and architectural decoration. For example, the front lapel and cuffs of traditional Manchu costumes often use symmetrical pattern designs, showing a strict sense of order and symmetry [3]. Balanced composition, on the other hand, achieves visual balance and harmony through the arrangement of asymmetrical elements. This kind of composition is also more common in Manchu decorative patterns, especially in some complex pattern designs. For example, in Manchu screens and murals, balanced compositions are often used to make the whole picture both varied and balanced through clever arrangement of elements.

3.2. The Law of Colour Application

Manchu decorative patterns have distinctive characteristics in terms of colour, often using red, yellow, blue, green and other bright colours to form a strong visual impact. Red symbolises passion and good luck, yellow represents dignity and sanctity, blue signifies tranquillity and profoundness, and green symbolises life and hope. These colour combinations not only reflect the aesthetic taste of the Manchu people, but also convey specific cultural connotations. For example, in the traditional costumes of the Manchu people, the combination of red and yellow is often used to show the love of life and the desire for a better future.

Plant motifs are also important subjects of Manchu decorative motifs, and common plant motifs include peony, lotus, pine, bamboo and plum. These plant motifs not only have ornamental value, but also contain rich symbolic meaning. For example, peony symbolises wealth and good fortune and is often used in the decoration of costumes and artifacts; lotus flower symbolises purity and elegance and is often used in the decoration of religious ceremonies and art works [2-3].

3.4. Symbolism of Patterns

The symbolism of Manchu decorative motifs is rich, covering many aspects such as ancestor worship, nature worship and religious beliefs. For example, the dragon pattern symbolises power and good luck, and the cloud pattern represents the fear and worship of nature. These symbolisms not only reflect the cultural beliefs of the Manchu people, but also reflect their reverence for nature and the universe.
